and unreserved. His majesty spoke his mind freely and showed himself to be surprisingly well posted on the transac-tions in parliament.

The emperor criticised M. Golovin's actions and questioned his impartiality in allowing much more freedom to the radicals than to the conservatives, mentioning particularly several speeches of M. Alexinsky, Social Democrat, which his majesty said should not have been permitted. M. Golovin in his defense leaded his difficult position as head of radical parliament at the present time. Various features of the ministerial rogramme were then discussed, but there was no hint of a dissolution of arliament, and the difficulties between Premier Stolypin and the lower house were not mentioned.

M. Golovin, previous to departing, alluded to the importance of direct relations between the monarch and the head of the lower house of parliament, and said he hoped his majesty would deign to receive him again. The emperor assented and explained that his delay in granting the president an audience had been due to the pressure of affairs. In the opinion of M. Golovin the re-actionary campaign against parliament
